Call goes out for new job coaches in Sunbury

There's a new employment services provider coming to town, aiming to transform the lives of Sunbury and Macedon Ranges residents, and they're looking for Star Weekly readers to join them.

Asuria has been helping people to reach their job and career goals for over 25 years, and from July, they will bring their expertise to jobseekers in Sunbury and surrounding areas.

To make that happen, they're opening their doors to people interested in taking up new roles as job coaches, Indigenous mentors and support staff.

Job applicants don't need any experience in the employment services industry to be part of this new wave of first-class job coaches.

What makes a successful Asuria job coach or Indigenous mentor is a combination of empathy, the ability to build relationships, a commitment to excellent customer service, and everyday office skills, including an understanding of Microsoft Office, Word, and Excel.

More than anything though, Asuria is looking for people with a passion for helping others.

"At Asuria, we're all a part of something which we call Enterprising Heart, which really sums up what it's like to be part of the company," community engagement officer Cynthia Jennings says.

"The way I help participants discover their dream roles is by really sitting down and getting to know them, building a rapport with them, and establishing trust and understanding.

"You'll know when you've found your dream job, when you turn up every day wanting to put your best foot forward for the people you're there to help. I'm very lucky because I've been able to find that with Asuria."

Cynthia Jennings is proud of the services she can provide to those in her community. (Supplied)

Job opportunities with Asuria are open now.

For more information on what it takes to be an Asurian, helping the people in your community to find and staying in work that matters, visit www.asuria.com.au/careers.